The Pestilence—New Orleans, 1853.
To the Editor of the Chicago Tribune.
In looking over an unpublished work by Charles Moreau Denis, who died at New Orleans several years ago, I find the following which seems to be a fitting tribute to the suffering at the South. Mr. Denis was a resident of Memphis, and a warm friend to the afflicted. His last days were spent with the New Orleans Plague, as translator of French and Spanish correspondence.

THE PESTILENCE—NEW ORLEANS, 1853.
The night bath comes.
And o'er the trembling city, the curfew Hangs brooding o'er the mass of life stilled In many hearts and homes.
The sickly woman
Hides, shuddering, her sad and dimpled face Among the shroud-like clouds that ragged hang Upon the limbs of the distressed night.
As up from the devoted city there do rise
The ceaseless sound of one incessant prayer, Clogged with the very anguish, and the wail Of children ones and orphans.

tively poor nobleman. He then discovered, for the first time, that he had been a victim of a conspiracy on the part of a number of blacklegs. It was too late though to repair the losses he had sustained, and his robbers had escaped with their spoils. His family, angry at the disgrace brought upon their house, had an open breach with the Duke, and he determined to leave the country.
He went to Paris, where he lived some months, and afterward to Brussels and the Netherlands. Tired of wandering about he determined to settle in London, and was for some time a lion in the clubs and salons of that city. He was still a gambler, and frequently played for high stakes, with varying fortune. Playing one night at the house of a well-known English nobleman, he had a serious difficulty with one of his opponents. The party broke up in disorder, and bad blood on both sides was engendered. Just as every one had begun to forget the affair, it was recalled by the act of the Duke of Calabritto himself. In some way the name of a woman became mixed up with it, and the Duke in a fit of anger revenged himself upon his enemy by an act which brought him into serious trouble. But for the timely aid of a friend, he would doubtless have been disagreeably dealt with. The Prince of Carini, at the time Neapolitan Ambassador in London, interested himself in the Duke's behalf, and succeeded in getting permission for him to leave the country. The Duke accepted the terms and determined to come to America.

Meanwhile the Duke's relations with his wife had become unpleasant. Influenced by her family, she refused to accompany him in his enforced exila-tion, and he accordingly left her behind.
With her dowry which had been settled upon her before her marriage, she had ample means, and, shortly after her husband's departure, she returned with her three children to Naples and took up her residence in the Palazzo Calabritto, where she has since lived in strict retirement.
The Duke came from London to New York in 1858 and lived for a time at the Astor House somewhat splendidly.
He was accompanied by a beautiful Parisian girl, who was generally supposed to be the Duchess of Calabritto.
After a few months of his sojourn here the Duke's money began to be exhausted, and, unable longer to support the expenses he was incurring, he determined to go South. The Parisienne remained in the city and opened a millinery store, sending her business cards around to people who had entertained her at the Duke's house. She was generally supposed to be the Duchess of Calabritto, and, in consequence, was very much sought after. The Duke, on his part, was very much interested in the life of the city, and he was very much interested in the life of the city,
